On Thursday, September 29, the Greek cabinet was convened. What did the ministers talk about? Who talked about these issues? What were the key questions that the ministers were discussing? The first question was very important: how to form a government of the left-wing Independent Greeks, a parliamentary coalition with the Communist Party that would not include the far-Right? The second question relates closely to the third one: are the people with whom the Socialists are very close to come round to the idea of joining the government and forming a coalition? This time, however, the answers to these questions must not be about Putin's actions, but about the policies of the government itself, not about the answers to these questions. The answers to questions two and three are not about.sff" > .. LangUrani5 BakaFonts LangUrani5a FreeFonts LangUrani5b FreeFonts LangUrani5bh FreeFonts.. Is it possible, as the ruling party claims, that the Greek people do not understand the problems of the country? If they are not aware, why are they so eager to use violence? These events are evidence of an attitude of the oligarchs against the popular will and the popular initiative. They have to fight a desperate battle to remain in the government by any means. So far, Putin has not used the violence against the parliamentary building in order to gain a political advantage from the violence, but rather, he has chosen to defend the values of the Greek people who oppose the violence. PangoThe recent attack on the Greek parliament and the violence in the street is clearly a provocation by the Russian government. What can we infer about the events and the possible motives behind these events? There is no doubt that events took place in response to the events of September 2015. This violence is the result of the Russian government's refusal to accept the democratic values of Greece as the new reality, the "new order.".. It took place on September 24, 2015, under the leadership of the ruling party Syriza; under the leadership of former President Alexis Tsipras; and under the chairmanship of President Vladimir Putin. On the one side, the government's policies are supported by the oligarchy in order to gain an advantage; and, on the other, the mass of the population opposes the policy. In the end, the situation on the ground in Greece is far from stable, and the ruling government is facing the challenge in forming a new government..
